

Wine: Man's Ancient Comfort

Winemaking can be traced back to the ancient civilizations of the Near East. An early reference occurs in the Old Testament book of Genesis which says that Noah "planted a vineyard, and he drank of the wine."

An ancient Persian legend of how wine was discovered is perhaps the most interesting. Prince Jemshed ordered a number of goatskin bags to be labeled "poison" after the grape juice in them, which was fermenting, had given him a stomachache. His favorite wife, having lost his attention, decided to kill herself by drinking from the bags. But by that time, the wine had matured, and she became gay and vivacious again – and won back the favor of her wandering husband.

Wine was introduced into northern Europe about 600 B.C. but was always "still" after maturing because it was brewed in open vessels.

Originally, bottles were stoppered with wool dipped in oil and wax, but in the late 17th century corks were introduced by a Benedictine monk, Dom Perignon. This leak-proof stopper allowed the secondary fermentation of champagne-type wine and put the bubbles in "bubbly".
